Action Collabs help groups discover innovative fixes to practical challenges and create real value for educators and learners. It is a collaborative approach to problem-solving that combines human-centered design thinking concepts with improvisation techniques to unlock a group's creativity and capacity for innovation.

ISKME offers two-day training sessions for participants to experience an Action Collab and then look under the hood to explore the rationale of each step in the process. Time is dedicated for participants to practice giving process instructions and facilitate activities with rich debrief and reflection on learning.

Everyone leaves with practical, relevant experience, a detailed Facilitator Guidebook, and a design challenge to implement in their own work.

Participants have used
Action Collabs to:

- Redesign curriculum
- Rethink parent engagement in schools
- Explore new models for structuring teaching and learning services
- Imagine new revenue models
- Transform educator professional development

"I learned how provocation is the land where innovation lives and how critical it is to get a group there. This includes the power of improv to bring about the innovation and provocation mind-set." - Action Collab training participant
